Engendering African Social Sciences:
Experiences from the Women and Gender Studies
Programme at Makerere University/Uganda

The Women and Gender Studies Programme in Makerere University is one of the few institutionalized attempts at engendering African social sciences. Nearly twenty years down the road, the department of Women's Studies has now grown into the School of Women and Gender Studies with four departments and is proud to host one of the best academic programmes in this field in Sub-Saharan Africa. What are the features that have characterize the sustainability of this programme when similar programmes elsewhere in the world are dwindling? What are specific dimensions of African universities and in which ways has the teaching of women and gender Studies influenced the social science curricula? What are current trends in this field of knowledge development in African context?
